

Hol and Chol are not cosmic dualities. They are the outcomes of a person's free-will choice. Every individual chooses whom they serve: the Lord, the adversary, or their own desires. God does not force righteousness or obedience, because a forced outcome would eliminate the purpose of the loyalty and fealty test. The test exists precisely because people must choose alignment on their own.

Righteousness in this framework is defined as doing what is right no matter the personal cost. Most people choose comfort, appetite, or self-direction instead. Over time, these choices harden into a behavioral pattern that becomes extremely difficult for them to change. This hardened pattern is what leads them toward the Chol outcome rather than the Hol outcome.

The stories of Elijah and Elisha illustrate this structure. Elijah represents the Hol outcome — everlasting life, cost-alignment, and righteousness. When the people attempted to kill Elijah, they rejected the Hol option. God instructed Elijah to appoint Elisha, who represents the Chol outcome — the fiery phoenix boundary that enforces the consequences of the people's choice. The Camel of God follows the same pattern: Hol was offered, the people chose appetite, and the Chol outcome followed.

This morning I saw another example fits the same architecture. A person was given tools to complete a task, but chose to follow their own appetites instead of the assignment. This is the fealty test in miniature: the moment the person's alignment becomes visible. It is the same structure as the Camel of God, Elijah and Elisha, and the "music lessons versus righteousness lessons" metaphor. People repeatedly choose appetite over righteousness, and God allows them to experience the temporary results of their desires.
